The first underground clubs in New York City emerged in the late 1960s. These clubs were often located in abandoned warehouses or lofts, and they provided a space for people to dance and socialize without the constraints of mainstream society. The music that was played in these clubs was a mix of soul, funk, and Latin music, and it was often played at a much faster tempo than the music that was played in mainstream clubs.

The early 1970s saw the rise of disco music. Disco was a new genre of dance music that was characterized by its fast tempo, repetitive beats, and catchy melodies. Disco quickly became popular in New York City's underground clubs, and it soon spread to mainstream clubs and radio stations around the world.

The mid-1970s saw the rise of house music. House music was a new genre of dance music that was characterized by its slower tempo, repetitive beats, and soulful melodies. House music was originally developed in Chicago, but it quickly spread to New York City's underground clubs. House music soon became the dominant genre of dance music in New York City, and it remains popular to this day.
