Lazaris claimed to have created the creature, which he called "Dragonman," using a combination of psychic powers and scientific techniques. He said that he had extracted DNA from a dragon and implanted it into a human embryo, which he then grew in an artificial womb.

The result, according to Lazaris, was a creature that possessed the strength and ferocity of a dragon, but the intelligence and appearance of a human. Lazaris claimed that Dragonman was able to speak, read, and write, and that he had a thirst for blood.

Lazaris's claims were met with disbelief and skepticism by the scientific community. However, he insisted that Dragonman was real, and he even offered to prove it by releasing the creature into the public.

In 2004, Lazaris held a press conference at which he claimed to have captured Dragonman on film. The footage, which was released on the internet, showed a blurry image of a creature that appeared to be a cross between a human and a reptile.

The footage was met with mixed reactions. Some people believed that it was genuine evidence of Dragonman, while others dismissed it as a hoax.

Lazaris insisted that the footage was real, but he refused to provide any further evidence to support his claims.

In the years since the release of the footage, Lazaris has continued to claim that Dragonman is real. However, he has never provided any concrete evidence to support his claims, and the scientific community remains skeptical.
