The Loopy Coop Hens are a group of backyard chickens who have been through a lot together. They've lost loved ones, they've faced predators, and they've even had to deal with the occasional nasty neighbor. But through it all, they've stuck together and supported each other.

Now, as they face a new challenge, they're learning to let go. One of their beloved members, Henrietta, has passed away. Henrietta was the oldest and wisest of the hens, and she was always there to offer a kind word or a helping wing. Her loss has left a big hole in the coop, and the hens are struggling to adjust.

At first, the hens were in denial. They couldn't believe that Henrietta was gone. They kept expecting her to come waddling around the corner, her feathers ruffled and her beak clucking. But as the days turned into weeks, they began to realize that Henrietta was really gone.

The hens were heartbroken. They mourned Henrietta in their own way, each one of them finding different ways to express their grief. Some of the hens cried, some of them withdrew from the group, and some of them became aggressive. But through it all, they supported each other. They huddled together for warmth and comfort, and they shared their memories of Henrietta.

As the weeks turned into months, the hens began to heal. They still missed Henrietta, but they learned to live without her. They realized that she would always be with them in their hearts, and they knew that she would want them to be happy.

The Loopy Coop Hens are now a stronger flock than ever before. They have learned how to cope with loss, and they have learned how to let go. They know that life is precious, and they cherish every moment they have together.

The Loopy Coop Hens are an inspiration to us all. They show us that even in the face of adversity, we can find strength and support in our community. They show us that it is possible to let go of our loved ones, and to continue living our lives with love and joy.
